The BLACK BAG

The little man seemed rarely complacent and inopportunely greeted Kirkwood's scowling visage as the latter peered through the window in the coach door, with a smirk and a waggish wave of his hand. The American by main strength of will power mastered an impulse to enter and wring his neck and returned to the girl more disturbed than he cared to let her know.

There resulted from his review of the case but one plan for outwitting Mr. Hobbs, and that lay in trusting to his confidence that Kirkwood and Dorothy Calendar would proceed as far toward Ostend as the train would take them—namely, to the limit of the run, Bruges.

Then, inspired, Kirkwood took counsel with the girl, and when the train passed at Ghent they made an unexpected exit from their coach, slipping themselves when the express had rolled on into the west upon a station platform in a foreign city at nine minutes past one o'clock in the morning, but at length without their shadow. Mr. Hobbs had gone on to Bruges.

Kirkwood sped his journeyings with an unspoken meditation and collected himself to cope with a situation which was to prove hardly more happy for them than the espionage they had just eluded. The primal flush of triumph which had saturated the American's humor on this signal success proved but a feeble and transitory when inquiry of the station attendants elicited the information that the two earliest trains to be obtained were the 5:00 for Dunkerque and the 5:37 for Ostend. A minimum delay of four hours, was to be endured in the face of many contingent features singularly unpleasant to contemplate. The station waiting room was on the point of closing for the night, and Kirkwood, alarmed by the rapid ebb of the money he had taken from Calendar, dared not subject his finances to the strain of a night's lodging at one of Ghent's hotels. He could himself force to be cruel to himself and the girl, and Dorothy's cheerful acquiescence to their sole alternative of trapping the street until daybreak did nothing to alleviate Kirkwood's exasperation.

It was permitted them to occupy a bench outside the station. There the girl, her head pillowed on the treasure bag, napped uneasily, while Kirkwood, plucked restlessly to and fro, up and down the platform, adding his poor, weary wits with the problem of the future—not so much his own as the future of the unhappy child for whose welfare he had assumed responsibility. Dark for both of them, in his understanding tomorrow loomed darkest for her.

Not until the gray, formless light of the dawn dusk was wavering over the land did he cease his perambulations. Then a gradual stir of life in the city streets, together with the appearance of a station porter or two, opening the waiting rooms and preparing them against the traffic of the day, warned him that he must rouse his charge. He roused and stood over her, reluctant to disturb her rest, such as it was, his heart torn with compassion for her, his soul lacerated by the cruel irony of their estate.

If what he understood were true, a king's ransom was secreted within the cheap imitation leather satchel which served her for a pillow. But it availed her nothing for her comfort. If what he believed were true, she was absolute mistress of that treasure of jewels, yet that night she had been forced to sleep on a hard, uncushioned bench in the open air, and this morning he must wake her to the life of a hunted thing. A week ago she had had at her command every luxury known to the civilized world; today she was friendless but for his inefficient, worthless self and in a strange land. A week ago, had he known her then, he had been free to tell her of his love, to offer her the protection of his name as well as his devotion; today he was an all-but penniless vagabond, and there could be no dishonor deeper than to let her know the nature of his heart's desire.

Was ever lover hedged from a declaration to his mistress by circumstances so hateful, so untoward? He could have raged and railed against his fate like any madman, for he desired her greatly, and she was very lovely in his sight. She was to him of all created things the most wonderful, the most desirable.

The temptation of his longing seemed more than he could long withstand. But resist he must or part forever with any title to her consideration—or his own. He shut his teeth and knotted his brows in a transport of desire to touch, if only with his finger tips, the woven wonder of her hair.

And thus she saw him when, without warning, she awoke. Bewildered at first informed the wide brown eyes, then, as their drowsiness vanished, a little laughter, a little tender mirth.

"Good morning, Sir Knight of the Somber Countenance," she cried, standing up. "Am I so utterly dis-table that you find it necessary to frown on me so darkly?"

He shook his head, smiling.
"I know, I'm a fright," she asserted, vigorously shaking out the folds of her plaited skirt. "And, as for my hat, it will never be on straight; but, then, you wouldn't know."
"It seems all right," he replied vacantly.

"Then please to try to look a little happier since you find me quite presentable."
"I do."

"Without lifting her bended head she looked up, laughing, not ill pleased. "You'd say so really?"
"Far down the railway tracks there rose a murmuring that waxed to a rumbling roar. A passing porter answered Kirkwood's inquiry; it was the night boat train from Ostend. He picked up their bags and drew the girl into the waiting room, troubled by a sickening foreboding.

Through the window they watched the train roll in and stop.
Among others alighted, smirking, the unspeakable Hobbs.
He lifted his hat and bowed jauntily to the waiting room window, making it plain that his keen eyes had discovered them instantly.

CHAPTER XXVI.

KIRKWOOD'S heart sank with the hopelessness of it all. If the railway directorates of Europe conspired against them, what chance had they? If the night boat train from Ostend had only had the decency to be twenty-five minutes late, instead of arriving promptly on the minute of 4:45, they two might have escaped by the 5:00 for Dunkerque and Calais.

"Miss Calendar," said Kirkwood from his heart, "just as soon as I get you home safe and sound I am going to take a day off, hunt up that little villain and lay him alive. In the meantime I forgot to dine last night and am reminded that we had better forage for breakfast."

Hobbs dogged them at a safe distance while they sallied forth and in a neighboring street discovered an early bird bakery. Here they were able to purchase rolls steaming from the oven, fresh pats of golden butter wrapped in clean lettuce leaves and milk in twin bottles, all of which they prosaically carried with them back to the station, lacking leisure as they did to partake of the food before train time.

Without attempting concealment (Hobbs, he knew, was eavesdropping round the corner of the door) Kirkwood purchased at the ticket window passages on the Dunkerque train. Mr. Hobbs promptly darted him by imitation, and so jealous of his luck was Kirkwood by this time grown through continual disappointment that he did not even let the girl lift his plans until they were about the 5:00 in a compartment all to themselves. Then, having with his own eyes seen Mr. Hobbs dodge into the third compartment in the rear of the same carriage, Kirkwood astonished the girl by requesting her to follow him, and together they left by the door opposite that by which they had entered.

The engine was running up and down a scale of staccato snorts in preparation for the race and the cars were on the edge of moving, coupling clanking, wheels a-groan, ere Mr. Hobbs condescended to join them between the tracks.

Warily, disheartened, Kirkwood reopened the door, flung the bags in and helped the girl back into their displaced compartment. The quicker route to England, via Ostend, was now out of the question. As for himself, he waited for a brace of seconds, winking wickedly at the ubiquitous Hobbs, who had popped back into his compartment, but scared ready to pop out again on the last encouragement. In the meantime he was pleased to shake a friendly foot at Mr. Kirkwood, trusting that men her out through the half-open door.

Only the timely departure of the train, compelling him to rejoin Dorothy at once if at all, prevented the American from adding murder to the already noteworthy catalogue of his high crimes and misdemeanors.

Their simple meal, consumed to the ultimate drop and crumb while the Dunkerque train meandered slowly through a sunny, smiling Flemish countryside, somewhat revived their faded spirits.

For a time they laughed and chattered, pretending that the present held no cares or troubles, but soon the girl, nestling her head in a corner of the dirty cushions, was smiling ever more drowsily on Kirkwood. And presently she slept in good earnest, the warm blood abbing and flowing beneath the exquisite texture of her cheeks, the ghost of an unconscious smile quivering about the sensitive scarlet mouth, she leant through the open window at her side, wanting at will in the sunlit witchery of her hair. And Kirkwood, worn with sleepless watching, dwelt in longing upon the dear, innocent allure of her until the sun in his heart had grown well nigh insupportable, then instinctively turned his gaze upward, searching his heart, reading the faith and desire of it, so that at length knowledge and understanding came to him of his weakness and strength and the clean love that he bore for her, and, gladdened, he sat dreaming in waking the same clear dreams that modeled her unconscious lips secretly for laughter and the joy of living.

When Dunkerque halted their progress they were obliged to alight and change cars. Hobbs discreetly snatched shadow at the end of the platform.
